Elizabeth -

Thanks very much for your expressions of support.

I was also touched by your gift of a 'magic rock' from 'mystical Cape Breton'. Unfortunately, it seems to have lost its shine. In fact, as you can see, it has become quite dull in appearance.

When your associates stop the ongoing damages caused by Health and Welfare's statements misdiagnosing the environmentally sensitive as crazy, perhaps we could get together and I could show you a few of the magic rocks I've discovered, in Central and South America, the Caribbean, Iqaluit, Lennoxville, Victoria, and Mt. Rundle which, for some reason, remain much more clear and shining.

Shiniest one these days is from the bank of the Richelieu River, where the first Canadian in our family drowned. A United Empire Loyalist, he was a spy for the British against the Americans, and occasionally evaded pursuit by urging his horses to gallop along the road beside the Richelieu, then jumping down and swimming the river while the Americans chased his empty carriage. Though he died trying to escape, the Americans didn't catch him.

A short two centuries later, I'm approaching other nations asking if in the future they would consider disabled survivors of North American pollution as refugees, on the grounds that our government has encouraged intolerance towards us, and has indicated in several public statements that it is quite content, at least for now, to let the disabling of one group by other Canadians continue.

Sure hope the shine returns to your rock,

Sincerely,

Chris Brown
